

The wonderful world of tomorrow ...more wonderful, and much closer, than you think!

A lively look into the future, by the staff of The Wall Street Journal

By the year 2000, imagine:

- living in a weatherproof community under a canopy a mile high and two miles in diameter!
- commuting 100 miles to the office in 10 minutes on a 600 mph air-cushion subway!
- doing your business by video-phone... signing deals by instantaneous facsimile transmission of the documents!
- returning to your home (kept absolutely dirt-free by automatic sonic cleaning) to watch the news on laser beams!
- catching up on the latest doings of our colonists on the moon!
- enjoying 3 times today's purchasing power
- flying overseas on hypersonic jets at speeds of 4000 to 6000 miles per hour!
- spending almost as much time on the golf course, at the concert hall, or in the trout stream as at the office!

Fantastic as these predictions may seem, they are solidly based on reality. Fascinating and thorough, this is an authoritative report on expected developments by the staff of The Wall Street Journal.

You'll examine the population problem and discover science's remedies for relieving the crush... the expected relief of the workload through those impersonal geni, the computers... how atoms for peace will yield us unlimited energy. Step by step you'll follow our proposed landings on Mars. You'll learn how new medicines will lengthen and improve our lives—how new military techniques will underwrite our national safety. (We'll have ground-to-ground rockets delivering U.S. Marines to troubled areas thousands of miles away in minutes.)
